SPECIAL EDUCATION SUPPLY LIST

Stock up on products that are easy to transport, easy to clean, and can be used in any environment.

As a new semester gets underway, we are faced with the reality that many students will remain in full-time remote learning, while others may be involved in a hybrid learning situation.

Being able to communicate and interact is essential but may be challenging, especially for students that need support from AAC devices. Simple devices that are easy to use and transport, can provide a foundation for these students to express themselves and their needs.

Distance learning can mean an increase in the volume of reading a student is responsible for, both in printed and digital format. Assistive technology can provide support with reading and enhanced comprehension that can make students more efficient while reading.

Low-tech and non-digital tools can also provide students with meaningful learning experiences. Products such as dry-erase materials can be used for a variety of learning activities, including letters, words, and numbers, drawing, writing (or prewriting), spelling, math, and more.

For students that have difficulty with focus and concentration, that difficulty can be amplified in remote learning. Taking a movement break can allow both the brain and body to refocus.
